

REMEMBERING OUR FALLEN FIRE FIGHTERS

by Scott Mellott, Retired

A few months ago, July 27th to be exact, I opened a group email from a long-time Fire Fighter friend. The email contained an attachment simply called "11setp2001."

The attachment was a slide show containing forty-five 911 related photos. The first slide was a shot of the very severely damage World Financial Center, which is directly across from the WTC. This is a building that I have walked past, some times more than once, every September since 2002.

The next slide was a picture of one of the 200 estimated human souls that jumped to their deaths. That was followed by an equally horrifying picture of 30 or 40 people at windows with the fire below them with the task of deciding, not if to jump, but when to jump.

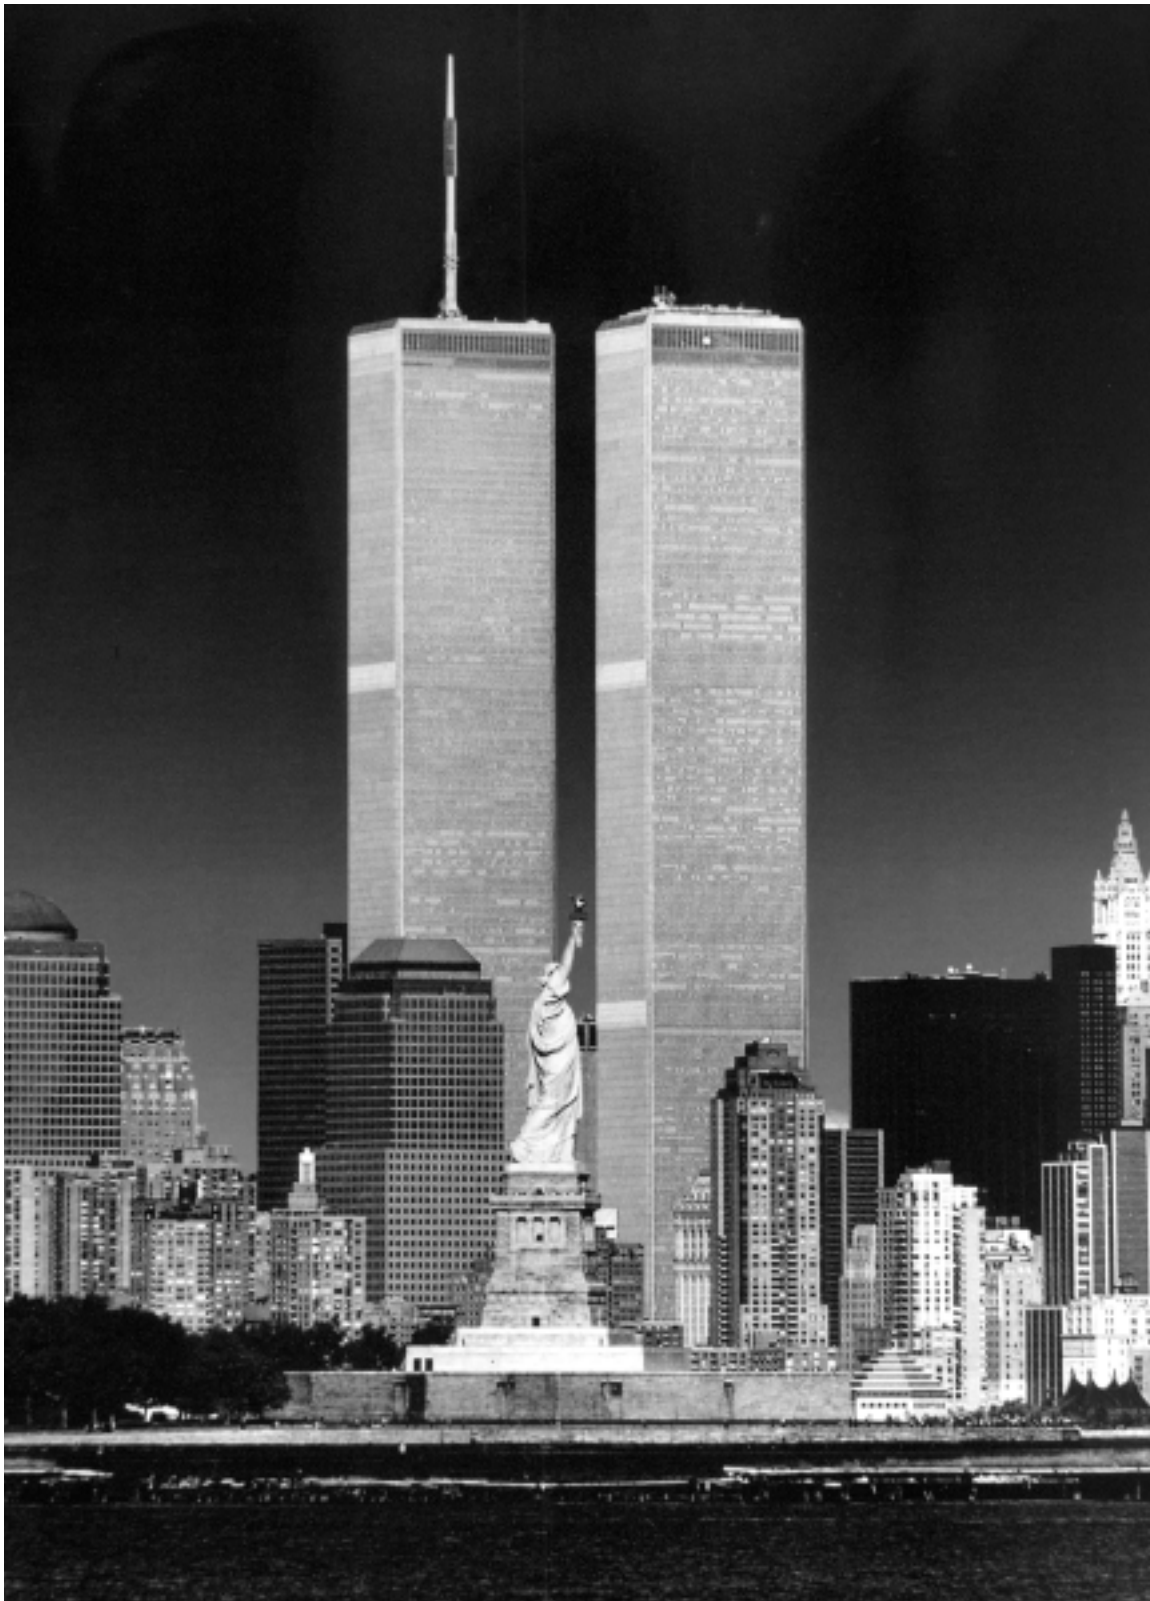

The very next picture in this unforgettable slide show was a picture taken seconds after the South Tower was struck by United Flight 175. Up until that moment, the occupants and the rescue workers inside both towers just thought they might be having a bad day.

As those of you that read my last month's article now realize, you are getting a double dose of 911. This month I won't give you the dozens of facts and figures I still have, to further embed in your brains, of what the real meaning of "having a bad day" is.

However I am closing this article with this fact. The friends and families of the 343 FDNY Fire Fighters who died that day have started the last 2,556 days with the same sense of loss that they felt after the worst day of their lives, September 11, 2001.
